FIDELIO.

Don Florestano, a Spanish nobleman, is immured as a state prisoner in a dungeon of a fortress near Seville. Don Pizarro, the governor of the prison, being his implacable enemy, has reported him dead, but meanwhile has ordered him to be confined in the lowest cell, where, by gradual starvation, Don Pizarro hopes to extinguish the life of his prisoner. Don Florestano, however, is blessed by the possession of a devoted and courageous wife, Leonora, who, doubting the report of his death, disguises herself as a servant, and, assuming the name of Fidelio, enters the service of Rocco, the jailor of the prison.

Fidelio soons becomes a favorite, and Marcellina, the daughter of Rocco, although pledged to Gracchius, the porter, becomes enamoured of the supposed boy. Leonora's design is thus advanced, and she soon obtains the consent of Rocco to accompany him to the dungeons of the prison. Meanwhile Don Pizarro receives a despatch informing him of the intended visit of Don Ferdinand, the minister, for the purpose of inspecting the prison, doubts having been raised as to the fate of Don Florestano.

Don Pizarro, fearing exposure, determines to kill Don Florestano, and, for this purpose, takes Rocco into his confidence. Rocco refuses to undertake the deed, but agrees to prepare the grave, Don Pizarro himself becoming the murderer. The conversation being overheard by Leonora, and suspecting the intended victim may be Don Florestano, she begs Rocco to allow her to assist him in his task. Rocco consenting, Leonora is soon in the presence of her husband, whom she recognizes only by his voice.

Don Pizarro, on learning that the grave is ready, approaches to kill Don Florestano, when he is interrupted by Leonora, she rushing between Don Pizarro and his victim, declaring herself the wife of Don Florestano.

Amazed at this interruption, Don Pizarro is about to kill both man and wife, when a trumpet call is heard announcing the arrival of the minister, Don Ferdinand. The designs of Don Pizarro are exposed, and he is degraded; Don Florestano is released; and Leonora is made happy in the arms of her rescued husband.

The scene is laid in Spain.
